LIBRARY OF BABEL

---

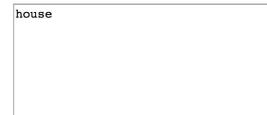

————— Jonathan Basile ————

The Library of Babel is a place for scholars to do research, for artists and writers to seek inspiration, for anyone with curiosity or a sense of humor to reflect on the weirdness of existence - in short, it's just like any other library. If completed, it would contain every possible combination of 1,312,000 characters, including lower case letters, space, comma, and period. Thus, it would contain every book that ever has been written, and every book that ever could be - including every play, every song, every scientific paper, every legal decision, every constitution, every piece of scripture, and so on. At present it contains all possible pages of 3200 characters, about  $10^{4677}$  books.

Enter up to 3200 characters:

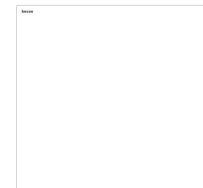

The library contains only lower-case letters,
space, comma, and period.

1,003 OBJECTS

————— Ingrid Burrington ————

Ingrid Burrington's online work 1,033 Objects draws attention to a system that is so massive it is hard to envision—a US government program that provides police departments around the country with excess military equipment. Burrington's website randomly pulls 1,033 items from the program's extensive online repository of data, which was made publicly accessible in 2014. As the artist explains, 1,033 Objects gives you "just a glimpse of this really large thing. If you try to take on the whole totality of the thing, you might actually miss the point."

1,033 random items distributed through the Pentagon's 1033 program.
